Participatory medicine is a movement in which patients and healthcare professionals actively collaborate and encourage one another as full partners in health.

Patient-advocate reviewers are currently being recruited! Please contact support@jmir.org if you are interested.
The Journal's mission is to transform the culture of care by providing an evidence base for participatory health and medicine.

It explores how patient and caregiver participation can affect care, outcomes, and relationships in healthcare; what factors and methods increase participation; how best to drive collaborative care; and the types of evidence that provide the most reliable answers.

Examples include research on the effect of patient portals and patient-facing digital tools; the impact of patient access to health data; research in patient and caregiver experiences, patient journeys, and patient/caregiver satisfaction with care; or innovations in making health care more participatory.